SHADOWS ON THE COLUMNS.

Superstitious People Study Silhouettes at the White House.

The shooting of President McKinley recalls to superstitious minds the shadows that have appeared in recent years on the large columns of the north or main porch of the White House, says the Washington Star. During the winter months these shadows are more distinct than in other months and appear near the top of the columns around the midday hours. It is recalled now that last fall a shadow appeared that had never been seen on the column before. It required no effort of the imagination to recognize it as a human forearm and hand, with bent finger upheld in the attitude of warning. It appeared and disappeared each day for a fortnight or more. Some time after this when the sun's position had changed, a shadow of a different form appeared on the great pillar at the extreme northwest corner of the portico. It soon took on definite shape and at 1 o'clock in the afternoon represented the face and shoulders of President McKinley in profile. The silhouette was so striking as to attract the attention of many people, who remarked that a more exact profile drawing could hardly be made by an artist. The likeness was not a correct one for more than a few minutes and then it changed with the position of the sun, and the shadow disappeared. A remarkably perfect likeness of the late Queen Victoria, even to an object on the head resembling a crown. Sometimes the shadows present the bent form of an old woman, with one hand resting on an object resembling a spinning wheel.

Had-Sinned Village.
On the western slope of the Barkly shire hills is a small village which is literally palatial red once in every ten or twelve years. Twenty-five years before the battle of Marston Robert Cunningham, a profligate of no means, passed through the settlement. His cart was upset and all his wares thrown out in the road. The villagers rushed to his aid, but when he took a hasty inventory of his stock he declared that much was missing, and furthermore denounced the place, and said it should thenceforth be known as "Pillfordshire." And thus it was known until 1825, when the villagers called a meeting to take steps toward throwing off the ignominious name. As a substitute name one mentioned "Red Rock." This was met by the objection that there were no red rocks in the vicinity. Whereupon a shrewd old man suggested that they could plant one. So a great rock by the roadside was given a coat of deep rich red, and since that time "planting day," which occurs about every dozen years, has been one of the great celebrations in Red Rock's history. It was last painted in the summer of 1925, so that it is comparatively fresh, and the rock itself is not a material more eternal than the painted surface. The villagers—Ladies' Home Journal.

Goldbeaters at Work.
It is interesting to watch goldbeaters at work in a gold leaf factory. These men, whose skins are mellow from the stains of gold, take up ingots from the virgin metal, pass them between steel rollers, whence they come like pie crust, and pass these through clover and clover rollers, till they are but little thicker than paper. The sheets of gold are then placed between pieces of heavy paper, are called goldbeaters' sheets, and bent them through the rollers and sheets until they are reduced to an unimaginable fineness. It has been proved that a sheet of gold leaf would turn out gold leaves. A sheet of gold would take 250,000 sheets of paper the thickness of an ordinary sheet of paper if formed in a leaf of gold. It would only require a single sheet of gold leaf of paper.
